Lord Arthur regarded him not He looked upon him as a man who was not much younger than his father. VOL. II. M CHAPTER IV. THE WEDDING. To-day we are to sign the contract; immediately afterwards follows the religious betrothal; on Saturday the young wife is to receive the congratulations of the family, and in the evening the new bridegroom assembles his friends at his own house. You too, dear doctor, are invited. My niece wishes to thank you for the attention you have shown her father. On Sunday Arthur can start on his travels. So spoke the Count, pausing occasionally, taking a pinch of snuff, and lightly passing the finely-scented handkerchief over his fingers. Johannes looked at the Count, not without surprise. My niece is all joy and delight at her regained liberty, he went on. Give a girl dress, carriages, diamonds, and her heart is speedily won. The young lady is well disposed to love her husband; if she is too young for him, the very fault has been his decoy. Her youth possesses that beauty which a judge like the Principe understands how to appreciate. Johannes felt a sort of indignation, as the Count mentioned the name of the bridegroom. From...
