Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: . . . when Derringforth had fallen like a meteor upon his vision. The hot blood burned in his cheeks. The pangs of jealousy pierced him. His eyes were still fixed upon Marion. The sway of her graceful figure was poetry. The thought that possibly she loved Derringforth was torture. He wondered if she would never cease playing. He looked at his watch, opening and shutting it so that it would not attract her attention. It was almost midnight. He grew impatient and raved at himself for the fiasco he had made. Why did I ever ask her to play he groaned. People never know when to stop when they sit down at the piano. The love of a few moments before was becoming nullified. He found himself getting provoked. It seemed to him indifference, even rudeness in Marion to neglect him as she was doing. He was upon the point of remonstrating when she turned to him and said in her sweetest way: Now are you not sorry you asked me to play One look from her eyes melted all his indignation, but not soon enough to remove the traces from his face before she saw it. No, certainly not. Didnt I tell you that I was just in the mood for music Yes, but I can read your feelings better than you think. How do you interpret them asked Edwards, coloring. The blush was reflected upon Marions face. I wont try to read beyond your dislike for...
