Not illustrated. 1858 Excerpt: . . . the most comprehensive sense of that noble relation. Dear Nelly, you'll not care for these speculations when you are longing to hear of your husband; but you will forgive them, knowing I have always been addicted to what Shakspeare courteously calls maiden meditation. I am coming to you on Saturday, with Franks last words and kisses for you and the children. He went off, cheered by a promise I made (and will explain to you), that I will put my shoulder to your obstructed wheel. When I returned from the ship to my own room at home, where I have not been since I first went to poor Augusta, I found on my table the trinkets which I left on that memorable evening scattered over the drawing-room carpet. They were enclosed in a box, sealed and directed with Mrs. Herberts pedantic nicety, and on the box was...
