I think, before I have done, I shall satisfy those persons that close and rotten boroughs were not intended by the phrase, settled institutions of the country. But, say another party, it is impossible to satisfy the public mind without shaking the settled institutions of the country. We are of an opinion directly the reverse. We think we may satisfy the public mind without endangering the settled institutions: but that the refusal to satisfy it would actually endanger the settled institutions of the country. We are of opinion that these institutions, resting, as they have hitherto done, upon the confidence and the love of Englishmen, must continue to rest on the same foundations: and while we decline to comply with extravagant demands, we are anxious to satisfy reasonable expectations. Agreeing neither with those bigoted adherents of ancient usage who assert that no reform is necessary, nor with those warm enthusiasts who declare that some particular kind of reform will alone be satisfactory or wholesome, we place ourselves on a ground which we hope to find firm and steadfast, between the abuses we wish to destroy and the convulsion we mean to avert. It will not be necessary, on this occasion, that I should go over the arguments which have been so often urged in favour of Parliamentary Reform: but it is due...
